Sheldon K. Johnson is a husband, a father, and a native son of Columbus, OH. His life's work is to build and sustain inclusive and equitable neighborhoods that allow all residents to thrive. Sheldon approaches this work with a lens of racial equity and addressing the social determinants of health. He currently serves as the Vice President of Community Development for Community Building Partners, an enterprise of Praxia Partners that seeks to bring investment to communities through the power of innovative collaboration.

In this role, Sheldon oversees capacity building projects with community organizations to guide them in building strategy, designing affordable housing projects, and implementing strategic plans. He is currently working with Dayspring Christian Community Development Corporation on a single-family initiative on the Northeast side of Columbus.

Sheldon is a 2008 graduate of the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor where he received a Bachelors in General Studies with concentrations in Black Studies, Political Science, and Education. He also holds a Master of Public Policy from Duke University's Sanford School of Public Policy and a Master of Divinity from Duke Divinity School.
